

Medst 341w Video Essay Analysis
Jessica Colon
12/18/24

Have You Ever Dreamt of a Better Version of Yourself?

First and foremost - The Substance is not feminist in terms of coupling theory with practice in order to promote feminist ideology; rather, it satirizes the gendered products of ideology reinforced through media via various beauty technologies and gendered power hierarchies. More specifically, it scrutinizes aspects of the male gaze, explores gendered hierarchies of power, probes our revulsion and obsession with beauty, aging and motherhood as a necessity of the gender construct, and highlights the capitalist undercurrent that stabilizes and supports the patriarchal structures via its intersection with beauty and aging. Of course feminism does not exist in a dimensional vacuum and theory in The Substance intersects heavily with psychoanalytical and postmodernist theory; while the film could also be analyzed using those theories as the dominant mode of interpretation, the film's exaggerated emphasis on body horror and abject themes as well as its assignation of negative and positive values to gender identities requires consideration for the gender analysis. Gender psychology and self-identification based on gender require simultaneous analysis of psychoanalytical and feminist themes, and our relationship to beauty technology and images of representational femininity requires simultaneous analysis of postmodern and feminist themes.

Feminism as a broad movement exists on a global continuum and its most general goal is to analyze and deconstruct power dynamics in patriarchal society; it blossomed in the modern age in the 19th century, setting off a series of "waves" that reflect a particular time period, culture, and values and builds upon the previous movement. First-wave feminism was born from securing women's right to vote; the next period, perhaps the most influential on film theory, was second-wave (1960s-80s), which began during a time of radicalization in response to social repression and political opposition and emphasized aspects of racial-gender equity, examined gendered hierarchies and sexism, and expanded the range of women's reproductive and social issues with which the movement concerned itself. The major difference between the two waves lies in the first-wave's emphasis on gender equality of access in society, whereas the second-wave concerns shifted toward equality of outcome as individuals began to examine the broader constructs imposed upon them and other marginalized groups. The lack of broader intersectionality is perhaps one of the reasons this period ended and third-wave feminism began in the 1990s in response. The emphasis on diversity in this movement laid the foundation for fourth-wave feminism, which builds upon all previous concerns and seeks to deconstruct gender roles and diminish abuse, harassment, sexism, and violence toward women.

It is here that "feminism" as a mode of thought also expanded to include considerations for body-positivity and inclusivity. It responded to oppressive gendered constructs of beauty, including exclusion of the overweight, elderly, disabled and sought to diminish taboo surrounding menses, body hair, and the general human functions of females that are shrouded in mystery due to societally enshrined revulsion and disgust. These considerations bear especially strong on the social media era, as the images that create, inform, and perpetuate our reality have the power to inform our understanding of gender norms, promote ideologies of appropriate gender behavior and appearance, and disguise the repressed via filters, editing, and extensive construction that does not admit, like a film, that it is a construction. Ironically, the empowerment of women as part of this fourth wave has led to an increase in social media influencers, raising the uncomfortable questions - how do we deconstruct gender roles when women perpetuate these hierarchies? Do we admire these women and buy into their beautiful ideology or do we speak out and inadvertently disempower them? And one cannot avoid the elephant in the room – all of these gender constructs and ideologies are expressly capitalist; beauty is not an abstract, but a consumable. Indeed we've seen plenty of evidence that over-consumption of beauty, as in the case of those addicted to plastic surgery or fillers can often lead to self-destruction, or self-consumption. What is the cost of buying into the gender construct?

In any case, it is these kinds of issues that feminist film theory aims to address.

The protagonists of The Substance are women, clearly living in a patriarchal society; the roles of medical personnel, television executives, on-set technicians, and flirtatious lovers are all occupied by men, while the women occupy the roles designed by men, for men – they are nameless assistants, background objects, or the subject of “the gaze”, although each of the main women represents a different cause and effect when held up to the other sex as a representation of sexual fantasy. Elisabeth is introduced as a product of a different era; her fitness show is static, dated, and visually archaic and declares to the viewer that she is old. The set is stale and dim, and there is very little scene interplay between images of Elisabeth's aerobics and the camera's symbolic “gaze” via a close-up of its disembodied lens. Once a worshipped media star, she is now being fired essentially for being 50 years old; when she probes her vulgar boss upon his statement that “at fifty it stops.” with “what stops?”, he squirms with discomfort at acknowledging her decreased social capital relative to gender and age – in a culture obsessed with representations and images of beauty that also happens to have the technology to achieve those representations (very postmodern), aging is an act of revolt, ultimately becoming revolting. Susan Sontag describes this social phenomenon as "Old age is a genuine ordeal, one that men and women undergo in a similar way. Growing older is mainly an ordeal of the imagination - a moral disease, a social pathology - intrinsic to which is the fact that it afflicts women much more than men. It is particularly women who experience growing older (everything that comes before one is actually old) with such distaste and even shame."<sup>1</sup> In a patriarchy, women are disposable in media as a consequence of commodifying “the gaze” to the extent that a sexually desirable fantasy of youth and beauty is the only consumable and all else is repulsive – for men, the desired consumable is an object of fetishization, while for women it is consumable as the intersection of capitalist ideology and patriarchal ideology.

Sue is a product of this drive for consumption; Elisabeth purchases a gene-altering beauty treatment that allows her to give “birth” to her most perfect, beautiful self. Because Elisabeth is the product of a patriarchal hierarchy that impresses their standards upon her as “desirable”, she manifests in Sue the same sort of sexual fantasy that men have in this world. Laura Mulvey’s description of “woman as image” applies to this self: “The determining male gaze projects its fantasy onto the female figure, which is styled accordingly. In their traditional exhibitionist role women are simultaneously looked at and displayed, with their appearance coded for strong visual and erotic impact so they can be said to connote to-be-looked-at-ness.”<sup>2</sup> Naturally Elisabeth’s most perfect self is a conventionally beautiful youth-coded woman who is treated onscreen as a poreless, soft focus, lip-glossed Lolita-esque Barbie doll; Elisabeth’s rapidly aging essence becomes antithetical to Sue, as she both hates herself and hates perceived competition, both things driven by the pressures of patriarchy. Sue takes over Elisabeth’s job after she is fired, driving aspects of the same competition that exists in modern society – achieving greater beauty in order to attain greater validation and social approval (predominantly from men). Beauty, as described by Sontag, is “a class system, operating within the sexist code; its ruthless rating procedures and intractable encouragement to feelings of superiority and inferiority persist in spite of (and maybe because of) a striking amount of upward and downward mobility. Beauty is endless social climbing.”<sup>3</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Sontag, Susan. “The Double Standard of Aging”, Essays of the 1960s & 70s. Library of America, 2013, pp. 746.

<sup>2</sup> Mulvey, Laura. “Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema.” Feminist Film Theory : A Reader. Edited by Sue Thornham, Edinburgh University Press, 2011, pp. 62-63.

In the patriarchal world of The Substance, beauty is capital (although whatever power it offers is only in the form of representation, not any kind of domination), and the way the camera pans around Sue’s form, moves close to her enhanced lips, circles her hairless and smooth body, and shows the fawning admiration of men in her orbit indicates a growing wealth in term of Sue’s ability to harness the gaze and realize her dreams (dreams for fame that demand approval from men). If current culture is considered as well, sexual empowerment has transcended a singular gender and Sue’s popularity could be attributed to selling an ideal of femininity or an attitude of empowerment and self-determination to both genders. Her ease of self and confidence transcend any gender-based restrictions on fetishization as she is purported to be someone’s most perfect self; she is, at first, an excellent sales pitch for conforming to these aspects of fantasy and desirability. We all want to be her or worshipped like her, whether or not we objectify her for sexual gratification or seek to be objectified in this way. Her amplified femininity, portrayed on screen with cinematographic effects, tiny clothing, luxurious hair, and sensual poses creates a form of hyperreal feminine representation that relates to multiple dimensions of the gaze: scopophilia, voyeurism, and narcissism, as she is an object of others’ gazes, an object of her own gaze, and a subject of her own patriarchy-informed gender conformity – and she is not even real at first, but a construct, like gender. Teresa de Lauretis’ description of “the sex-gender system’s” circularity can be summed up as such; “the construction of gender is the product and the process of both representation and self-representation.”<sup>4</sup> Elisabeth’s reality is presumably the “main”

---

<sup>3</sup>Sontag, Susan. “Beauty: How Will it Change Next?”, Essays of the 1960s & 70s. Library of America, 2013, pp. 807

<sup>4</sup>De Lauretis, Teresa. “The Technology of Gender.”, Technologies of Gender. Indiana University Press, 1987, pp. 9.

one to the film viewer's subconscious, and Sue's existence draws parallels to plastic surgery, manipulations of reality, and artificial means of creation – but she becomes realized when she becomes “famous” and, to some extent, representational. Mulvey describes this phenomenon aptly: “Going far beyond a woman's to-be-looked-at-ness, cinema builds the way she is to be looked at into the spectacle itself. Playing on the tension between film as controlling the dimension of time and film and controlling the dimension of space, cinematic codes create a gaze, a world and an object, thereby producing an illusion cut to the measure of desire.”<sup>5</sup>

One aspect of vital importance here is the male response to what is being gazed upon: Elisabeth's age and unpleasant (but normal) feelings generate discomfort. Her boss simply does not want to engage with her in any capacity. When she cries in the doctor's office, the doctor awkwardly invents an excuse to rush away. When she bumps into Sue's one night stand, he is enraged by the space she occupies. Sue, however, is the most fetishized and hypersexual aspects of “woman”; she offers herself to the gaze, alleviating what Mulvey describes as a “castration anxiety”<sup>6</sup>, reinforcing and propagating gender constructs that position women as passive objects and men as active dominators. In scenes of her fitness show, “Pump it Up”, we can even see the camera lens “interact” with her in a more dynamic and engaging manner than it did with Elisabeth as it moves close to her body and emphasizes the sexuality of her physical movements; even though the name “Pump it Up” might already be concerned idiomatically with invigorating types of exercise, it's impossible to ignore the euphemistic potential of the name as the camera pans across her body and really emphasizes her potential to be fetishized by the gaze and, ultimately, her potential to generate erections.

---

<sup>5</sup> Mulvey, Laura. “Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema.” pp. 68.

<sup>6</sup> Mulvey, Laura. “Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema.” pp. 65.

Ultimately, Sue, for all her vitality and confidence, is merely a dimension of Elisabeth's psyche and a product of her insatiable desire to resume proximity to the gaze despite her decreasing beauty "capital". The machine that drives the narrative into this particular terrain is a clandestine unnamed organization that provides access to a serum that activates your "most perfect self". Elisabeth's preoccupation with resuming approval from society, and thereby resuming her spotlight in "the gaze", sends her nervously scurrying through strange unmarked alleyways to pick up this product; her only "education" provided on the topic is provided via flashy marketing, phone calls with an anonymous (and thereby disembodied) male voice, and a video contained on a usb-drive. It is not entirely dissimilar from what we see today on social media, as multi-level marketers and influencers prey on the empty, insecure, and dissatisfied among us by overpromising and underdelivering on the consumables of their lifestyles, and yet...so many are taken in by the fantasy and possibility of porelessness, noninvasive anti-aging miracles, painless hair removal, they are willing to straddle the line of safety and risk in order to "consume" the image of beauty reinforced by society.

It is this fantasy of youth and rejuvenation that permeates women's aging; movies like Death Becomes Her explore these notions of beauty, ephemerality, and immortality, and, similar to The Substance, position women as competitive participants in the mechanics of the gaze. The fantasy manifests, as Linda Williams says in "Film Bodies", as "a setting for desire, a place where conscious and unconscious, self and other, part and whole meet."<sup>7</sup> The fantasy of eternal youth reveals friction between the conscious, Elisabeth, and the "unconscious", Sue (reinforced by her id-like sexuality, impulsivity, aggression, and pleasure-seeking); the fantasy is really the reconciliation of these things, but due to the nature of The Substance, Elisabeth's insecurity, and

---

<sup>7</sup> Williams, Linda. "Film Bodies: Gender, Genre, and Excess." Feminist Film Theory: A Reader. Edited by Sue Thornham, Edinburgh University Press, 2011, pp. 277.

Sue's pleasure-seeking they can never be reconciled. This fantasy of externalized self-improvement also operates much the same way in real life; the results of plastic surgery, if done properly, are glorified, while the gruesome labor and risk associated with it are somewhat detached from the discourse, and, for those plagued by the insecurities impressed upon them by social constructs, the results of plastic surgery are limited by the possibilities of science and can neither reverse nor permanently halt aging. Plastic surgery also cannot correct the internal wounds that drive a person to repress aspects of themselves. However, we are bombarded with ideology that suggests youth is the ultimate consumable; "People let the direct awareness they have of their needs, of what really gives them pleasure, be overruled by commercialized images of happiness and personal well-being; and, in this imagery designed to stimulate ever more avid levels of consumption, the most popular metaphor for happiness is 'youth'."<sup>8</sup>

Interestingly, despite the broadly unfavorable consensus toward displaying surgery gore publicly, we are still somewhat covertly drawn to the repressed aspects of surgical alterations and beauty treatments, watching reality tv shows of surgeries and closely-framed TikToks of pore extractions and abscess draining; in recent history, the internet has enabled niche pockets of explicit discussion regarding the less savory aspects of surgery, gore, and death featuring images of things we would rather repress, mostly due to the automatic physical response of revulsion or sympathetic pain. In The Substance, there is an emphasis on bodily fluids and on-screen reactions of disgust that mirror society's discomfort with these things, but also emphasis on the covert voyeurism that allows those representations to persist. Sound, framing, and visuals surrounding the medicalized aspects of injecting The Substance, recovering from The Substance, and maintaining the balance of The Substance by way of exchanging fluids every seven days harken to plastic surgery or medicalized and technologized beauty treatments. The on-screen reactions – nightmares, gagging, pain, screaming – call attention to the ways in which women might be disgusted with the procedure they are doing or having done to themselves, completely uneducated or unfamiliar with its technology, or undergoing intolerable pain for the outcome – and yet, they are committed to performing these revolting rituals for the sake of the patriarchy’s approval. Sue’s later decay also draws attention to these “disgusting” elements; she pulls loose teeth from her mouth, removes a fingernail as it suddenly pops off, and catches her ear as it falls off her head. She is not visibly old, but she is clearly aging.

---

<sup>8</sup> Sontag, Susan. "The Double Standard of Aging", pp. 746.

It’s a far cry from the nubile and glistening Sue who crawls out of Elisabeth’s back earlier in the film. This, along with the similar “birth” of Monstro Elisasue, contribute to a birth and motherhood motif that weaves its way through the film; there are vagina-like slits from which Sue and Elisasue appear, and Elisabeth and Sue’s dynamic resembles the narcissistic mother-daughter dynamic. They participate in a cycle of reactive spite that resembles the perpetuation of gender-based generational trauma as women are pitted against one another, even their own children and parents, in order to maintain the status quo of patriarchal subservience. There are constant images of breasts; Elisasue even vomits a breast onto the NYE show stage, forcing an inescapable association between sexuality, creation, and monstrosity. The film even begins with very overt images of reproduction - the camera focused on a single egg yolk, essentially an embryo, and it is injected with a substance and then splits into two yolks. This foreshadows the coming “births”, although they are considerably less clinical and detached than the yolk parthenogenesis<sup>9</sup>. The emphasis on “maternal figures” is, according to Barbara Creed,

---

<sup>9</sup> In biology, parthenogenesis is a type of asexual reproduction strategy typically resulting from limited mates; interestingly, in this context, the etymology of the word, partheno- = ‘virgin’ and -genesis = ‘birth’ evokes aspects of the “virginal mother”, or Madonna-whore complex. Quite apt for a film that comments upon female representation.

an aspect of abjection; she references Julia Kristeva's description of this phenomenon: "...all individuals experience abjection at the time of their earliest attempts to break away from the mother. She [Kristeva] sees the mother-child relation as one marked by conflict: the child struggles to break free but the mother is reluctant to release it...Kristeva argues that the maternal body becomes a site of conflicting desires...The position of the child is rendered even more unstable because, while the mother retains a close hold over the child, it can serve to authenticate her existence – an existence which needs validation because of her problematic relation to the symbolic realm."<sup>10</sup>

After injecting the substance, Elisabeth groans and writhes on the bathroom floor, her back opens up and a moist elbow reaches out; then there are a series of flashing lights and perspective changes to Sue's. She sees her mother's "womb" split open; Elisabeth is lying on the bathroom floor with a large bleeding wound down her spine. Sue reaches up a hand, it is as wet and moist as a fetus would be after swimming in amniotic fluid for months; then, like a child, she stands up and looks at herself in the mirror for the first time, enacting the "mirror stage" of Lacanian psychoanalysis. Of course she immediately vomits a strange neon liquid, then sews up her "mother's" back wound. It is extremely visceral; Sue gags and the camera provides an ultra-close-up of Sue's stitching, allowing the wound to become a vagina-like slit. When it heals, it almost resembles a caesarean section scar. All this association with motherhood, however, does not intend to celebrate it; rather, it is part of Creed's "monstrous feminine", as she notes that "virtually all horror texts represent the monstrous-feminine in relation to Kristeva's notion of maternal authority and the mapping of the self's clean and proper body. Images of blood, vomit, pus, shit, etc., are central to our culturally / socially constructed notions of the horrific. They signify a split between two orders: the maternal authority and the law of the father.”<sup>11</sup> Creed also suggests that “The abject can be experienced in various ways – one of which relates to biological bodily functions...In relation to the horror film, it is relevant to note that food loathing is frequently represented as a major form of abjection...The ultimate in abjection is the corpse. The body protects itself from bodily wastes...by ejecting these things from the body just as it expels food that, for whatever reason, the subject finds loathsome. The body ejects these substances, at the same time extricating itself from them and from the place where they fall, so that it might continue to live.”<sup>12</sup>. All of this is evident in the film, from the excessive bodily fluids to Sue’s ambiguous dream of pulling a chicken drumstick out of her anus-like bellybutton to Elisabeth’s French cooking meltdown and Sue’s emotionally charged (but still appropriately demure) response to the gluttony in which she screams “you have to control yourself!”

---

<sup>10</sup> Creed, Barbara. "Kristeva, Femininity, Abjection." The monstrous-feminine: Film, feminism, psychoanalysis. Routledge, 2015, pp. 11-12.

Images of abjection are especially evident especially toward the end of the film; as Sue loses consciousness due to a lack of stabilizer fluid, she locks herself in the bathroom. Her extremely masculine lover comments on the blood spray on the carpet, asking “are you on your period?”, giving one pause to reconsider all the other previous nosebleeds as an aspect of her “cycle”. But the amount of blood up until this point is reasonable and contained. Elisabeth awakens, having aged quite rapidly due to Sue’s unwillingness to share a body, and in a frustrated rage tries to terminate Sue. Her narcissism prevents her from completing the job, and Sue awakens and an aggressive and bloody fight ensues. It is rare to see such unfettered and bloody violence toward a “senior citizen” (although we know Demi Moore and Elisabeth Sparkle are not so elderly; perhaps our lack of immediate revulsion hinges on the artifice of film effects and celebrity associations); Sue essentially drop-kicks Elisabeth’s hyper aged and revolting body across their apartment, culminating in her death and the onset of Sue's decay. If aging Elisabeth is the first representation of abjection, Sue's refusal to tolerate the abject is her demise; Creed describes this phenomenon as such: "Although the subject must exclude the abject, the abject must nevertheless be tolerated, for that which threatens to destroy life also helps to define life."<sup>13</sup>

---

<sup>11</sup> Creed, Barbara. “Kristeva, Femininity, Abjection.”, pp. 13.

<sup>12</sup> Creed, Barbara. “Kristeva, Femininity, Abjection.”, pp. 9.

Sue, like Elisabeth, does not know life outside the gaze and resorts to desperately injecting the Substance's remaining activator; the result of this desperation is another variation of Kristeva's abject, "the place where meaning collapses". Here, however, the abject is taken to extremes. Monstro Elisue is a distortion of Sue and Elisabeth, a distortion of any recognizable human form in fact, and ejects a great deal of fluid to really drive home the degree of offense and revolt this "woman" is supposed to engender. At one point, an extension of the male gaze tries to cut her head off, but a new one springs up in its place, unwillingly defiant and ready to explode. Her arm is cut off instead, and the camera moves overhead to witness her spin and spray blood, unrestrained by the patriarchy; viewers are also treated to the audience reactions, which range from terrified to traumatized. While the gore seems excessive without context, "the modern horror film often 'plays' with its audience, saturating it with scenes of blood and gore, deliberately pointing to the fragility of the symbolic order in the domain of the body where the body never ceases to signal the repressed world of the mother."<sup>14</sup> Elisue essentially denies and obscures the male gaze with copious blood, an extension of her menstrual capacity; viewers are also forced to acknowledge the essence of her sex as she first vomits a breast onto the stage prior to the bloodbath. In this way, she becomes the dialectic opposite to "the gaze" and provides a new solution to the frustrations of deconstructing representation adequately; she is the antithesis to representation, exuding abjection to a degree it traumatizes the audience and sends people into a blind chaos.

---

<sup>13</sup> Creed, Barbara. "Kristeva, Femininity, Abjection.", pp. 9.

<sup>14</sup> Creed, Barbara. "Kristeva, Femininity, Abjection.", pp. 13.

As a “feminist” film, The Substance does not meaningfully deconstruct gender by reinventing paradigms of representation; rather, it satirizes the existing representations – that are universally recognizable in our culture – and derides their underlying societal drives, although by nature of its commentary is predominantly a “woman’s film”. De Lauretis supports this notion that “a film may address the spectator as female, rather than portray women positively or negatively...one can see that the question of a filmic language or a feminine aesthetic has been articulated from the beginning in relation to a women’s movement: ‘the new grows only out of the work of confrontation’ (Mulvey); women’s ‘imagination constitutes the movement itself’ (Bovenschen)...”<sup>15</sup> At times it is a caricature of reality, exaggerating personalities and emphasizing the absurd (and ending in a campy bloodbath), but it often blurs the line between reality and possibility by drawing attention to the very real gender hierarchies and constructs that perpetuate themselves via media. The film comments upon the male gaze and enacts the mechanics of castration anxiety – women must be marginalized in some capacity, reduced to objects for consumption or pleasure, or destroyed entirely in order to maintain the status quo. It also correlates the gaze to fantasy; the pursuit of approval by the gaze (or the pursuit of a superficial sense of security in a patriarchy) inevitably overlaps with the pursuit of a universal “youthful beauty”. This fantasy is sold as miraculous or transformational beauty treatments via plastic surgery and other understudied and unregulated beauty “technologies”. It only exists, in part, due to the recurring obsession with youth and vitality and the frustrating fact it cannot truly be revisited; aging is an inevitable progression of cellular decay, spurring crises of existence and purpose, and for women it assumes even more complexity in a society that only feels “safe” when women are reduced to images – images in particular of young women, whose youthful exuberance imparts a sense of virility and power onto those who observe them.

---

<sup>15</sup> De Lauretis, Teresa. “Rethinking Women’s Cinema: Aesthetics and Feminist Theory”, Technologies of Gender. Indiana University Press, 1987, pp. 135.

However, the fantasy is a lie; there are costs and risks associated with conforming to the gaze. Elisabeth’s fantasy gives birth to a part of her that she both loves and hates; the “return of the repressed” reoccurs throughout the film in fluids, vomit, blood, gaping wounds, hideous physical deformity, exploding viscera. Elisabeth’s consciousness is literally destroyed by her unconscious when this fantasy reaches its climax; the cumulative repression of true self and the frustration and rage toward the confines and structural implications of “the gaze” manifest as Monstro Elisue, and as she twirls onstage after being “outed” as a monster, spraying blood from a hole in her “shoulder”, it becomes the ultimate abjection – a bloody indictment of the audience, who in this moment becomes a representational body of society that perpetuates highly objectified representations of women at the expense of their body. Elisue is the “anti-gaze”, a forced witnessing of the abject and perhaps a demented commentary on the extent one will risk mutilation to repress the rough edges of humanity, or “womankind” in particular; however, her explosion into a pile of viscera suggests the impossibility of this kind of deconstruction existing in society for any period of time – The Substance is not here to change reality but to comment upon it for our benefit. But for Elisabeth, the fantasy ends happily, as her disembodied clone head detaches from its pile of gore, travels to her Hollywood star, and hallucinates flashbulbs, cameras, and exclamations of approval; as she dissolves into liquid, she has fulfilled this gender-youth fantasy, although it emphasizes the transience of fulfillment – perhaps as a warning for the rest of us who are still trapped in the representational oppression of the patriarchy.

Link to Presentation (also sent to email) <https://drive.google.com/file/d/1LXCdg-beCtNAvGp8L0xQ738z6CgGPrnU/view?usp=sharing>

References:

Chaudhuri, Shohini. Feminist Film Theorists. Routledge, 2006.

Creed, Barbara. "Horror and the Monstrous Feminine: An Imaginary Abjection." Feminist Film Theory : A Reader. Edited by Sue Thornham, Edinburgh University Press, 2011, pp. 251-266.

Creed, Barbara. The monstrous-feminine: Film, feminism, psychoanalysis. Routledge, 2015.

De Lauretis, Teresa. Technologies of Gender. Indiana University Press, 1987.

Kristeva, Julia, et al. "'APPROACHING ABJECTION,' FROM POWERS OF HORROR: AN ESSAY ON ABJECTION." Classic Readings on Monster Theory, Arc Humanities Press, 2018, pp. 67-74, <https://doi.org/10.1515/9781942401209-010>.

Mulvey, Laura. "Visual Pleasure and Narrative Cinema." Feminist Film Theory : A Reader. Edited by Sue Thornham, Edinburgh University Press, 2011, pp. 58-69.

Sobchack, Vivian Carol. "Scary Women: Cinema, Surgery, and Special Effects." Carnal Thoughts : Embodiment and Moving Image Culture. University of California Press, 2004, pp. 36-52, <https://doi.org/10.1525/9780520937826>.

Sontag, Susan. Essays of the 1960s & 70s. Library of America, 2013, pp. 745-768, 806-829.

The Substance. Directed by Coralie Fargeat, performances by Demi Moore, Margaret Qualley, and Dennis Quaid. MUBI, 2024.

Thornham, Sue. Passionate Detachments. Oxford University Press, 1997.

Williams, Linda. "Film Bodies: Gender, Genre, and Excess." Feminist Film Theory : A Reader. Edited by Sue Thornham, Edinburgh University Press, 2011, pp. 267-281.